Liam Pitchford's first experience of World Table Tennis was a positive one as he recovered from losing the first set to beat South Korea's Jang Woojin 3-1 (9-11, 11-4, 11-10, 11-7).

It was a close match-up on paper against an opponent ranked three places below him at world No 18, in a Battle Round One match over five games, with sudden-death points at 10-10.

In a scrappy start, there were no points won on serve until the seventh of the match, when Jang finally notched one to go 5-2 up.

Pitchford struggled to avoid the top of the net early on, though admittedly that helped him win two successive points from 5-9. He later saved two game points before a heavy Jang forehand proved unreturnable and the Korean took the first 11-9.

There were signs that Liam was finding his game towards the end of the first, and he took that into the second, opening up a 6-1 lead – another dead netcord on the last of those points.

Pitchford was upping his aggression, taking the ball earlier and setting the tempo of the rallies more than he had in the first, and two big backhand flicks won the last two points of a game he took 11-4.

To say the third game was close was something of an understatement, as the players traded points from 4-4 all the way up to 10-10.

Liam missed the game point at 10-9, a positive backhand going off, but he had the serve for the crucial sudden-death point.

The tension ramped up with two lets, but it was third time brilliant for Pitchford as he found a perfect forehand at full stretch to win the point and move 2-1 ahead in games.
